The dam itself is 1,160 feet long and has nine tainter gates to control water flow. The primary function is to facilitate commercial barge traffic on the Mississippi River. The locks allow vessels to bypass sections of the river with varying water levels, essentially creating a series of pools. The National Great Rivers Museum explains the structure and its engineering. Through interactive exhibits, a theater, and tours, the facility introduces the public to the great rivers, their environments, the importance of their presence, and the interaction with humans.
