Background on Day I Programming

The Franklin Institute: A science and technology museum in Philadelphia dedicated to public education. It is named after Ben Franklin, one of America's earliest and most inventive leaders. For Senate Chiefs, this visit will highlight leadership qualities that support effective decision-making, problem-solving, and management in complex professional environments.

Calder Gardens: The visit to the Calder Gardens will allow Senate Chiefs to engage in peer-to-peer exchanges, while providing the opportunity to examine themes of innovation, interpretation, and resilience, as inspired by Alexander Calder's work. This facilitated tour will encourage Senate Chiefs to think creatively on their decision-making practices—a crucial skill needed to navigate the unique and competing priorities inherent in the management of a Senate office.

The Barnes Foundation: Philadelphian Albert C. Barnes (1872-1951) chartered this museum in 1922. The galleries will be open to the Senate Chiefs for a guided educational viewing led by a Barnes Foundation docent. The docent's tour will discuss how cultural institutions preserve and interpret national identity. This will in turn foster opportunities for peer-to-peer discussions on leadership, institutional values, and stewardship.

Moderated Panel Discussion: This discussion will ground the Leadership Conference in the broader semiquincentennial context. The panelists will discuss the historical significance of Philadelphia and how major civic commemorations, such as the 250th anniversary of the country's founding, require coordination, planning, and strong public engagement. This discussion will reinforce how Chiefs play similar roles in managing complex organizations and institutions.

7:00-9:00 pm	Program dinner and facilitated leadership discussion at Rex at the Royal

Background on Day II Programming

Independence National Historic Park: Independence Hall—where both the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States were once debated—is not only a historic site but also a laboratory of early American leadership. As Senate Chiefs are provided with a guided tour of Independence Hall, the Liberty Bell, and Congress Hall, they will examine how our Founders navigated conflicting interests, forged compromise, and sustained trust during unprecedented national uncertainty. These sites highlight leadership skills grounded in consensus-building, ethical reasoning, and institution-building. This tour asks Chiefs to consider how foundational leadership principles can inform their modern team management and organizational culture within congressional offices.

MOAR: Further highlighting Philadelphia's pivotal role in our country's history, MOAR tells the story of the American Revolution. The MOAR illustrates how leaders like George Washington operated in times of instability, scarcity, and evolving public identity. The panelists for the lunch sessions will reflect on the historical significance of the events of the American Revolution and how the decisions made 250 years ago still inform leaders today. This visit and lunch panel will prompt Chiefs to discuss historical decision-making and lessons relevant to senior staff roles today. This session will also invite Chiefs to reflect on historical leadership approaches and their relevance to contemporary professional environments.

A Man Full of Trouble: This site offers a glimpse into the informal networks where ideas circulated, relationships were built, and early American political culture took shape. For Senate Chiefs, this site visit will allow reflection on the importance of informal leadership spaces—the hallway conversations, coffee-shop discussions, and interpersonal trust that often play an important role in professional environments.

Carpenter's Hall: This historic building originally housed the First Continental Congress in 1774 and was also home to Franklin's Library Company and the American Philosophical Society. This is an ideal venue for the Senate Chiefs to explore themes of collaborative leadership, information sharing, and the role of intellectual communities in shaping institutions and public discourse.
